THE ROEHAMPTON CLUB STORY

ROEHAMPTON CLUB is steeped in history and prestige. At the turn of the 19th century there was a tremendous strain on London's polo clubs, and many, including Wimbledon were considered to be too far from the capital. Three keen polo players, the Miller brothers, formulated a plan to alleviate the problem, and on April 1st, 1902, Roehampton Club officially opened. The original facilities included three polo grounds, a racecourse, showground, an area where women could practise driving, tilting and jumping, and stabling for members' horses.

From its early days, croquet was extremely popular at the Club, and from 1904, Roehampton played home to The Open Championship; 1904 also saw the opening of a nine-hole golf course which was later expanded to 18. Sadly, 1950 spelled the end for polo at the Club, where its focus switched to other sports, for which it is now renowned.

Throughout its rich history Roehampton Club has been at the heart of London society. Influential clientele including Lord Hugh Salisbury, Admiral of the Fleet (later Earl) Beatty, and Winston Churchill were all prominent polo playing members. The royal and aristocratic connections of the Club were strengthened by the Duke and Duchess of Kent and the Aga Khan who were all made Honorary members for life in 1935, followed by the Duchess of Gloucester, and King Edward VIII granting his patronage in June 1936.

One of the BBC's earliest outside broadcasts was carried out from the Club over three days in July 1938, featuring a variety of sporting events including tennis, archery, diving, riding, polo, croquet and golf.

Roehampton Club's unique sporting heritage has carried on through the 1950's to the present day.

Tennis legends Angela Mortimer, Christine Truman, Margaret Court and Evonne Goolagong all won Open Hard Court titles here and Andy Murray started winning grass court titles from the age of 15 in our Club Med Championships.

Hosting four Croquet World Cups and having Nigel Aspinall and Reg Bamford, World Champions past and present, as members has firmly placed the Club as one of the top international croquet venues in the world.

Encouraging young sporting talent has now become one of our priorities and Samantha Fuller, aged 12, Roehampton Club Ladies Golf Champion and European Age Group Champion is leading the way in that regard! Be part of this rich heritage with an event at Roehampton Club and enjoy its many facilities.
